After Night Soldiers, I turned to Dark Star (1992 and my favorite to date), then The Polish Officer (1994) The World at Night (1996 — and the weakest of the group), and just now Kingdom of Shadows (2001). Every one of these except Night Soldiers I have listened to as an audiobook, all of them narrated by the same reader, George Guidall. The Furst-Guidall combination is absolutely the most inspired of any author-reader combination on my iTunes list, and that is saying something.

Kingdom of Shadows is further proof that Alan Furst has no equal among historical novelists. As he did in World at Night and Red Gold with Jean Casson, Furst's protagonist, Morath, is cast into the pre-WWII spy game almost by accident. But unlike Casson, Morath is less reluctant in accepting his new life of duplicity.
